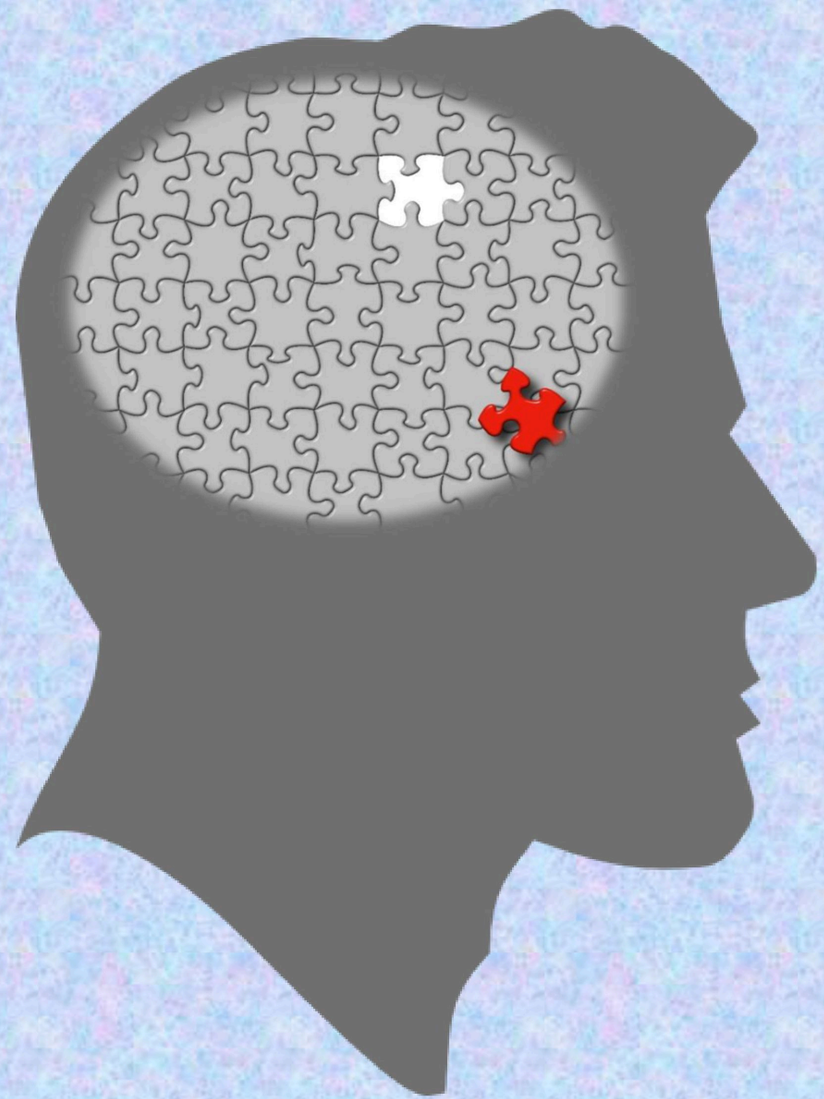
Johanna Brehmer | CC BY-SA 4.0

Indian Navy's interest in Dolphin Run Island stems from Cartosat-3 satellite's multicolor optical imagery showing that the bright noctilucent skirt revealing the coastline is disrupted nightly at one particular sea inlet. The analysts have concluded that there is 'something' that appears nightly to attract a large number of sea mammals to that inlet, disturbing the colony of bioluminescent organisms there. Marine biologists could not offer any explanations of this phenomenon. They said that sea life is so astoundingly diverse that nothing incongruous – not even the sea monster Ningen or Kraken – would attract a crowd of sea creatures. Upon this an analyst quipped: There may be mermaids! That name has stuck. Within the naval intelligence community, this privately held Maldives island goes by the codename Mermaid Island.

© Linda Bucklin | dreamstime.com

Greet Mr. Ganguly, Consulting Detective Bibhas De

Greet Mr. Ganguly, Consulting Detective



Bibhas De